Research Workshops in Princeton, NJ on

Religion and the Built Environment in cooperation with the Architecture, Culture, and Spirituality Forum

Fall Semester 2020 - Spring Semester 2021

CTI invites research proposals in theology, architecture, and related disciplines.

Architecture is a way in which we structure our understanding of the world and our place in it.

The built environment is replete with cultural meanings. Not only sacred buildings have religious and theological significance. The built structures and spaces we design and inhabit in everyday life—everywhere from homes, neighborhoods, and cities to workplaces, concert halls, and public squares—raise questions about God and spirituality for religious and secular traditions of thought and practice. In turn, how can the built environment be a theological and spiritual resource for human and planetary flourishing in an era of rapid urbanization, globalization, and climate change? CTI welcomes applications from researchers studying these questions in theology and architecture, as well as in religious studies, the social and life sciences, humanities and arts.

16-Week Fall Workshop - August 17 to December 11, 2020

16-Week Spring Workshop - January 19 to May 14, 2021

APPLY online between September 1 and December 1, 2019

The Center of Theological Inquiry is an independent center for interdisciplinary research with an international program for visiting scholars who welcome collaborative inquiry on global concerns.

We convene research workshops where resident members work daily in adjacent offices at CTI's Luce Hall, Monday to Thursday, and discuss work in progress in weekly seminars. Members also participate in the Architecture, Culture, and Spirituality Forum's Critical Conversations on the built environment at CTI. The Center provides furnished, low-rent housing for members, who must cover all other living costs.
